Many Years ago, I was doing a security run-in north-East Victoria. It was probably about 02:00 on a cold winter morning when a I saw what I thought was a Golden Labrador run out of the bush on my right. I slowed right down for fear of hitting it. It got to within only a few metres of my car and I had a clear view of it. It had a strong thick tail that stuck almost straight out, well developed back legs and a board square head. It bounded rather than ran, and when it accelerated it powered off using is hind legs and almost lifting front legs clear of the ground. It crossed in front of me and jumped a fence to my left. From where I was its actions seemed more reminiscent of a wallaby than a dog. If it had stripes, I didn't see any, or they were very faint. What I saw, who knows, I'm not going to speculate. Have great New Year, and happy hunting.
